

How to Create Effective M&A Communications

---

White Paper

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION .....	3
STAKEHOLDER IDENTIFICATION .....	4
BUYER/SELLER EXECUTIVES .....	4
LEADERSHIP TEAM .....	5
MANAGERS .....	5
EMPLOYEES .....	5
CUSTOMERS .....	6
SHAREHOLDERS .....	6
PARTNERS AND SUBCONTRACTORS .....	7
INDUSTRY ANALYSTS .....	7
PRESS .....	7
COMMUNICATION PLANNING .....	8
KEY MESSAGE PLATFORM .....	8
SPOKESPERSON SELECTION AND TRAINING .....	9
COMMUNICATION TOOLS .....	10
COUNTDOWN TO “A-DAY” – AND BEYOND .....	11
ONCE YOU DECIDE TO PURSUE A POSSIBLE M&A .....	12
TWO MONTHS BEFORE ANNOUNCEMENT DAY (OR “A-DAY”) .....	12
FOUR TO SIX WEEKS BEFORE A-DAY .....	12
ONE WEEK BEFORE .....	13
DAY BEFORE A-DAY .....	13
ANNOUNCEMENT DAY .....	13
POST-ANNOUNCEMENT .....	14
CLOSE DAY .....	15
POST-TRANSACTION .....	16
CONCLUSION .....	17
SOURCES CITED .....	18

INTRODUCTION

The government contracting market continues to evolve, in great part due to an enduring stream of merger and acquisition (M&A) activity. GovCon transactions support a range of strategic goals, from portfolio/client diversification, to contract or technology acquisition to rapidly increasing growth. In recent years, economic confidence, public valuations and favorable credit markets combined to increase the number and size of transactions.

We've also seen a steady infusion of private equity (PE) investment in the GovCon market. According to Susan Gabay, managing director of Houlihan Lokey, there were 10 government services platforms backed by private equity in 1999. Today, there are 80 PE-backed platforms and 50 unique funds – part of a consistent strategy to repopulate the middle market.

“PE loves government contracting and government services because of the steady-eddy nature of the revenue stream, long-term contracts, relatively great credit quality in the customer, and the government is the biggest buyer of technical services in the world,” explains Jason Rigoli, partner at Enlightenment Capital.

Whether a transaction is a merger of equals, an infusion of capital and resources from a PE firm, or multiple acquisitions of smaller companies, a successful M&A can transform companies for short-term and long-term success. Still, there are real risks. Estimates vary, but a 2019 Investopedia<sup>1</sup> article indicates that M&A transactions are estimated to have only a 50% chance of success.

Company stakeholders can make or break an M&A transaction. GovCons that execute an M&A communication plan that effectively addresses all stakeholder groups can substantially improve customer impressions, employee engagement, speed and effectiveness of an integration, and market confidence in the new company.

*At the end of 1999,
there were*

10

*government services platforms backed by private equity. 20 years
later, there are 80.*

*M&A transactions are estimated to have only a 50%
chance of success.*

*“PE loves government contracting and government services
because of the steady-eddy nature of the revenue stream, long-term contracts [and]
relatively great credit quality of the customer.”*

*Jason Rigoli
Partner,
Enlightenment Capital*

STAKEHOLDER IDENTIFICATION

Communications of any kind are only effective if they resonate with their intended audiences. When it comes to M&A communications, your audiences are exactly those stakeholders your organization encounters in business every day.

Long before the M&A deal, consider your stakeholders. What does each group need from you? What do they expect from your organization? Ultimately, every stakeholder will want to know:

- 1) Why make any deal?
- 2) Why this deal?
- 3) Why now?
- 4) What does this mean for me?

If you have solid answers to those questions, you'll have clarity of purpose when exploring your M&A possibilities. It will shape your business and communications strategies every step of the way.

Buyer/Seller Executives

Organizational executives want what's best for their companies, their customers and their employees – in this market, at this time.

Executives seeking to grow their companies will look for acquisition targets that expand their capabilities and customer base. Most will look for companies that have a similar culture, so the combined company will have a better shot at winning.

Executives looking to sell may be doing very well on their own, yet recognize the vast hurdles to organically grow to the next level. Or maybe the company is under-performing and won't get ahead without an investment or acquisition. Perhaps it's a small business with unique technology or desirable contracts that will be more sustainable long term by adding value to a larger company.

Robert Lohfeld, Jr., CEO of SEV1Tech, sees M&A as a nearly inevitable step for small GovCons. "Everybody has to cross the chasm," he explains. "Once you're at around $50M, small business is done."

Whatever your situation, your early pitches and capabilities presentations should clearly articulate what you have to offer and what you're looking for in a partner. You'll likely

"Everybody has to cross the chasm. Once you're at around $50M, small business is done."

*Robert Lohfeld, Jr.
CEO, SEV1Tech*

Long before you make an M&A deal, consider your stakeholders. What does each group need from you?

adjust these early messages, based on the feedback you receive in early meetings and which partner you select. Ultimately, these core nuggets will serve as foundational elements for your full M&A communication platform.

Leadership Team

Senior leaders of both companies will want to understand the value of the two companies coming together, how the new organization will be structured, and what their role will be (if any).

In your early deal conversations, define your leaders for the go-forward company. Will the leadership teams be integrated? Will the acquired leadership team stay intact? Will they leave right away? Or be phased out in the coming months?

Make these decisions early, so your leaders can do what they do best – facilitate company progress and growth – even if they personally will not stay in their jobs.

Managers

Managers are translators. They translate company strategy into plans for teams and individuals to thrive. They also translate employee and customer needs into potential business opportunities.

Equip your managers to help their teams through next steps while delivering products and solutions to customers.

Employees

Every employer says their most important asset is their people. That’s certainly true for M&A transactions. Employees have enormous influence on the degree of success or failure of a merger or acquisition.

More than any other stakeholder group, employees will need to feel informed and valued. If they’re not getting laid off, you’ll need them to choose to stay. But an M&A is bound to shake up the status quo and prolonged ambiguity will create undue speculation, driving the best to leave.

Provide clear and early information about the direction of the company, the leadership, their role and employee benefits to help retained employees recommit to the new company.

Customers

Bringing two companies together must make sense for customers. “Always try to add customer capabilities through the M&A and hope that one plus one equals more than that,” advises Rigoli.

Customers may be interested to learn that, because of the transaction, you will have more to offer them. But first they’ll want reassurance that they will continue to get what they get from you now. Many may be concerned that the M&A will distract you from serving them well.

Damon Griggs, CEO of Dovel Technologies, describes his company’s value to customers this way, “As a rapidly growing company, we continue to maintain our entrepreneurial spirit, flexibility, and agility needed to support our customers’ missions. We combine that with the scale of a midsize company and the backing of a large private equity firm to make investments in focused M&A, subject matter expertise and transformational technology.”

When announcing your M&A, let customers know whether they’ll still be working with the same team. If there are any changes – to your people, how customers work with you, or changes to existing products or services – be very clear about what customers can expect and who can answer their questions.

Shareholders

Shareholders own a piece of the company. Whether private stock or publicly traded, shareholders will want their investment protected. If viewed unfavorably, an M&A can raise doubts and shake support from this important stakeholder group.

When communicating with shareholders, share the strategy behind your M&A as well as specific near-term and longer-term market opportunities for the company.

“Always try to add customer capabilities through the M&A and hope that one plus one equals more than that.”

Jason Rigoli
Partner,
Enlightenment Capital

“We continue to maintain our entrepreneurial spirit, flexibility, and agility needed to support our customers’ missions. We combine that with the scale of a midsize company and the backing of a large private equity firm to make investments.”

Damon Griggs
CEO, Dovel Technologies

Partners and Subcontractors

Business partners and subcontractors invest their time and people into relationships with you to better serve shared customers. They'll want to understand whether the M&A will result in any change to how you work together. For example, if you acquire or merge with a company that has similar capabilities to any of your partners or subs, it's reasonable to expect that you will be sending them less business as a result. Conversely, if you anticipate more shared opportunities after the M&A, they will want to know.

Be clear with partners and subcontractors about whether there are any changes and who can answer their questions.

Industry Analysts

M&A transactions are usually of great interest to analysts, who are constantly monitoring and assessing market conditions. They will want to gauge the value of the transaction to the market, anticipating the impact to customers and competitor organizations. And their opinions carry considerable weight.

They'll ask, "Is this a merger of companies with complementary services? Have they been serving many of the same customers? Is one company simply buying access to a desirable government contract? Or making the acquisition to take out a competitor?"

Griggs outlines areas to vet for a potential acquisition, "We look at four Cs: customers, capabilities, contracts and culture." Starting with that succinct headline, Griggs is well-positioned to lead industry analysts – and other stakeholders – through his company's M&A story.

Brief the analysts that follow you closely, so they understand the strategy and value of the deal.

Press

Reporters look at M&A transactions according to their beat. If you execute well on your communications strategy and provide key messages to seed the market, top reporters will want to speak with you under embargo, before you announce the deal.

Government industry reporters will examine many of the characteristics that industry analysts are looking at, ultimately trying to evaluate whether the combination of your two organizations makes sense for your company, your customers and partners. They'll examine the deal for its positive (or negative) impact on the competitor and industry landscape.

For example, in the GovCon world, companies live and die by government contracts – especially large and active indefinite delivery indefinite quantity (IDIQ) contracts. “If you are for sale, you’d better communicate your wins on each IDIQ,” advises Joyce Bosc, president and CEO of PR firm Boscobel Marketing Communications.

When you announce your transaction, share with business writers the financial value of the transaction, the leadership structure, number of layoffs and any reconciliation of real estate.

COMMUNICATION PLANNING

Long before the deal is made, experienced companies start planning communications to internal and external stakeholders. Your M&A strategy should, in fact, shape your overall corporate communications – not just what you'll say when the deal is done.

Especially if you're aiming to be acquired within a year, issue press releases on your contract wins and task orders on coveted contract vehicles. If you're planning to expand into a new market through M&A, though, you may hold back on public communications about your own activity in that area until the deal is announced. Many companies postpone hiring senior executives until after an M&A, knowing that they may acquire great talent through the transaction.

Use the time leading up to your transaction to nail down what to say, who will say it, and how and when you'll share your news.

Key Message Platform

Start with drafting your key message platform, the handful of important points you'll want all stakeholders to hear. Capture the initial messages as you solidify your strategy for pursuing any M&A deal. You will fine-tune these as you select an M&A partner and move through due diligence.

Your M&A strategy should, in fact, shape your overall corporate communications – not just what you'll say when the deal is done.

A key messaging platform starts with a statement of fact describing the transaction: “XYZ Company has signed a definitive agreement to [acquire/to be acquired] by ABC Company, a [description]. The acquisition is expected to close [timeline].”

Then craft three or four core messages that highlight the strategy, culture, and benefits of the transaction – with several “proof points” that will lend credibility to the claims. Core messages might tout the combination of two recognized leaders, introduce how the combined service offerings will provide something new to customers, or highlight synergies around culture and commitments.

Spokesperson Selection and Training

It’s not always possible for the acquiring CEO to be the sole spokesperson on the transaction. Certainly, employees of both companies will want to hear from the CEO. So will the press, analysts, key partners, and some customers.

Identify executives and other leaders to take on spokesperson roles, so all stakeholders get the information they need.

- CEO: All-hands meetings, top press briefings, top industry analyst briefings
- CFO/Investor Relations Lead: Investor calls
- Human Resources Leaders: Employee meetings and emails
- IT and Practice Leaders: Industry analyst and customer conversations
- Business Development Leaders: Customer and partner calls and meetings
- Public Relations: Press scheduling and facilitation

For all publicly facing spokespersons, provide media training to ensure that all comments:

- Represent your company brand
- Persuasively communicate your news, value, and story
- Build trust with each stakeholder audience
- Provide the audience with memorable key points.

Communication Tools

M&A press releases, emails, presentations, and other communications typically undergo multiple revisions to fill in the blanks or update key points as business decisions are finalized going into the transaction.

Generally, you'll need agreement around a core set of decisions/facts surrounding the transaction. Strive to have your communications address all the elements of a strong news story:

- Who (Company profiles. Who leads. Who stays, who goes. Customer profiles.)
- What (Merger or acquisition. New or combined offerings. Sunsetting products or services.)
- Why (Reason for the transaction and timing. Benefits to company, customers, employees and other stakeholders)
- When (Timing of key transaction milestones and decisions.)
- Where (Headquarters, office locations. Website and social media addresses.)
- How (How are the two companies coming together. Stand-alone? Fully integrated? Subsidiary?)

While the facts don't change from one stakeholder group to the next, you'll have some specific messages aligned with the benefits to each.

Also, because a lot can change as details get sorted out between Announcement Day and the transaction closing, many companies hold off announcing certain details until the acquisition is complete.

Closing communications often include information such as:

- Specific leadership names, roles, responsibilities
- Anticipated layoffs
- New divisions
- Office space consolidations, reconciliations
- New company branding (usually, company name and logo)

"Company names and brands are assets in the deal, deserving rigorous and diligent evaluation," reminds Bosc<sup>2</sup>. "Buyers need to consider the strength of the acquired brand. A strong brand could be hyphenated or co-branded using both names. Consider the company and product brands separately."

Here are common M&A communication tools you may use to share your important news:

- All-hands/town hall presentation
- CEO video address
- Customer FAQ
- Customer/partner call scripts
- Customer/partner emails
- Employee email
- Employee FAQ
- Employee welcome giveaways
- HR documents
- Intranet page
- Investor letters/emails
- Management FAQ
- Press release
- Public FAQ
- Social media posts, images
- Website updates

“Company names and brands are assets in the deal, deserving rigorous and diligent evaluation. Consider the company and product brands separately.”

Joyce Bosc

*president and CEO
Boscobel Marketing
Communications*

COUNTDOWN TO “A-DAY” – AND BEYOND

Executing your communication plan is a fine balance of finalizing the messaging, creating the communication tools, preparing your M&A event and next steps. Timeliness is as important as the messages you share – before, during and after the transaction.

Determine your schedule based on your deal timeline. Messaging work starts well before you secure the deal. As you finalize your M&A agreement, finalize your core messages and the timing of your communications.

Usually, M&A public announcements include both an intention to acquire – with an anticipated timeframe to close the deal – and later confirmation that the acquisition is complete. While you won’t have all the details on announcement day, your communications should include as many decisions as possible – and provide a general timing for when some of the other details will be announced.

Timeliness is as important as the messages you share – before, during and after the transaction.

Once You Decide to Pursue a Possible M&A

As you start to meet with potential M&A partners, work with your communications lead to craft your capabilities presentation. Adapt your key messages based on early feedback.

Map your external communications to your M&A strategy. Use press releases, executive presentations and thought leadership to promote capabilities that could be attractive to buyers. If you anticipate making an acquisition to get into a new market, you may strategically limit public announcements about your own emerging capabilities in that area.

Two months before Announcement Day (or “A-Day”)

Once you have a preliminary M&A agreement, start laying out your plans for the transaction and integration. Use the time leading up to the announcement to fine-tune your messages, prepare your spokespersons and start to map out your integration strategy.

- Activate your vetted integration team of executives and HR, IT, PR, Ops, and BD leaders to shape and finalize your strategy
- Include your communications lead in the due diligence effort and start the key messaging platform
- Start outlining your communication schedule
- Circulate your press policy to employees

Laying the integration groundwork early will help confirm that the cultures will fit – before you sign the deal. It also makes the combination efficient, once the deal closes.

Four to Six weeks before A-Day

As you move closer to announcement day, transaction decision will help to fill in the blanks on the final key messages and the communication tools in development. Be sure your spokespersons are equipped to effectively deliver the messages you’re preparing – and to field anticipated questions and concerns.

- Finalize your Key Message Platform
- Start drafting and circulating employee, customer, and partner communications
- Start to build your A-Day communication schedule
- Provide media training for spokespersons

One Week before

The final week is a push to nail down all the details of the agreement and plan. Communications drafts will need to be reviewed, finalized and approved by senior executives and the legal teams.

- Finalize all communications to reflect decisions about the combination
- Finalize A-Day comms schedule
- Prep spokespersons with additional FAQs
- Block spokespersons' calendars for anticipated press, analyst, customer, and investor calls

Day before A-Day

When it comes to announcement communications, it's an "inside out" process. Beyond the deal team/integration team, core managers will be the first to hear the news. If timing permits, brief them late the day before the announcement, so they have time to review the materials and prepare to start sharing the news with their teams the next morning.

- Stage all A-Day communications
- Brief core managers and provide supporting materials
- Spokesperson and HR travel, as needed
- If practical, share the press release under embargo with a few trusted media contacts to schedule CEO interviews

Announcement Day

This is the day to bring the Key Message Platform to life, announcing to your community the facts of the transition, benefits of the combination and any leadership decisions that have been made. You'll have specific messages for each stakeholder group.

Continuing the "inside out" approach, employees should be the first group the CEO briefs on announcement day – usually at the same time that the press release crosses the wires. The All-Hands meeting will set the tone for the transition. It will be important to share what you know, be clear about what decisions are ahead and provide ballpark timing for the close date.

Encourage questions from employees – at the meeting and in the days that follow. Really listen to find out what's important.

When it comes to announcement communications, it's an "inside out" process.

As soon as the press release is distributed, send, and post the approved employee, customer and public communications. Then, work with your communications team to support your internal and external spokespersons through their calls and briefings. Note the unanticipated questions that come up, so the team can better prepare for the next conversations.

- Distribute and post press release to website
- Facilitate All-Hands meeting
- Post communications to company intranet and website
- Send approved emails, with FAQs
- Coordinate calls with the press, investors and analysts
- Start call-downs to key customers and partners

Post-Announcement

Though you may heave a huge sigh of relief that you made it through A-Day, your communications work has just begun. Over the next few weeks, it will be important for executives and managers to be visible and available.

For the first week, consider a daily check-in call at the end of each day with your team, to monitor progress on communications, capture initial feedback, prepare answers to new questions, and confirm or adjust next steps.

- Ask managers to meet with their employees to answer questions
- Make HR resources available to employees
- Schedule face-to-face meetings with customers for the week following announcements
- Continue press and analyst briefings for the most important contacts
- Work with your communications team to facilitate follow-up on requests from the media and analysts you can't brief directly
- Collect feedback, using agreed-upon channels

For the weeks between your announcement and transaction close, stay in touch with stakeholders. Provide regular updates to employees. Visit customers and partners at their site or yours.

And remember to keep up communications that are not directly related to the M&A transaction. New contract win? Distribute a press release and brief the press. New product or service milestone? Keep your core analyst team informed. If yours is a publicly traded company, your investor communications will be more regulated. Just make a point to keep investors aware of earnings and milestones that you've always included in your earnings calls and communications.

Close Day

A lot can change as details get sorted out between announcement day and the M&A closing. Transaction close is when integration kicks off in full swing.

On the close day, distribute your "close" press release, publish website and social media updates and distribute employee and customer FAQs. Your stakeholders will expect to hear about:

- Specific leadership names, roles, responsibilities
- Anticipated layoffs or executive departures
- Consolidation of office space
- New or consolidated divisions
- New company branding (company name and/or logo)
- Target integration milestones

Employees and customers need to know who's in charge, how to reach them, where to ask questions, and when you'll be hosting meetings or events that help bring the companies together. Offer HR meetings for employees to review new benefits packages, as needed.

"If you look at the most successful acquisitions, it's really not about the company and its capabilities. It's about the integration. The integration makes or breaks every deal," stresses Jean Stack, managing director of Baird Government Services Investment Banking.

Post-transaction

It took former Harris Corp IT spinoff about three months to come up with its Peraton name. As Nick Wakeman, editor-in-chief of Washington Technology reported<sup>3</sup>, Harris Corp had made several acquisitions, including Exelis and CapRock Communications, that were never truly integrated before the spinoff. Peraton executives understood that employees were fatigued by changing ownership and made integration a priority.

Jeremy Wensigner, COO, Peraton, described the challenge, “We are keenly aware that our intellectual property goes home at night. I want them to come to work feeling enriched by doing something important. What they do matters.”

Your M&A integration agenda may not be as complex as Peraton’s was. But integrating the teams, knowledge and culture across the new organization will help employees feel valued, engaged, and excited for what’s next.

Be sure you have – or hire – the executives you need to take the company through this next phase of growth and development. “A good management team can turn an okay business into something awesome. A good business with a mediocre management team is generally not destined for success,” reminds Rigoli.

Ongoing communications throughout the integration process will help all stakeholders focus on how they can help the new company serve customers. For at least the first six months following your close, communicate milestones with employees, customers, and other stakeholders.

- Publicly announce new executive hires, contract wins and other milestones that reinforce company value

“We are keenly aware that our intellectual property goes home at night. I want them to come to work feeling enriched by doing something important. What they do matters.”

*Jeremy Wensigner
COO, Peraton*

“A good management team can turn an okay business into something awesome. A good business with a mediocre management team is generally not destined for success.”

*Jason Rigoli
partner,
Enlightenment Capital*

- Schedule a media tour with key publications to introduce your new leadership team and share your vision
- Meet with key customers to introduce new leaders, outline your product or service strategy, and answer any questions they have
- Plan company events to celebrate milestones

CONCLUSION

For GovCons, mergers and acquisitions can increase a company's market power by expanding capability sets, acquiring customers and contracts, or securing capital and resources for growth. But these are risky moves that can underperform or even fail if stakeholders are not on board.

Merging or acquiring companies must consider all of the stakeholders affected by the transaction and how the M&A will affect them. Effective communications, starting long before the deal is identified and fully aligned with the M&A strategy, can help gain essential stakeholder support and help ensure a positive outcome.

SOURCES CITED

<sup>1</sup> Picardo, Elvis. "How M&A Can Affect a Company." Investopedia, Dec. 3, 2019.

<https://www.investopedia.com/articles/investing/102914/how-mergers-and-acquisitions-can-affect-company.asp>

<sup>2</sup> Bosc, Joyce. "How to Tap the Art and Science of a Successful GovCon M&A." WashingtonExec, May 17, 2017. <https://washingtonexec.com/2017/05/how-to-tap-the-art-and-science-of-a-successful-govcon-ma/#.XlhA26hKiUk>

<sup>3</sup> Wakeman, Nick. "Harris IT Spinoff Takes on a New Name." Washington Technology, July 2017. <https://washingtontechnology.com/blogs/editors-notebook/2017/07/new-name-peraton.aspx>

About Boscobel Marketing Communications, Inc.

As a government contractor, your reputation precedes you, whether through the press, advertising, content or social media. Since opening our doors in 1978, Boscobel has launched companies and solutions, while positioning clients with industry-first, innovative solutions that elevate profiles and establish brands.

A Woman-Owned Small Business, Boscobel is a full-service public relations and marketing firm exclusively serving government contractors, with specialty practices in M&A communications and pre-RFP marketing. Our clients specialize in aerospace, artificial intelligence, big data and analytics, cybersecurity, engineering, enterprise IT, health care IT, mobility, satellite technology and more.

Our team of passionate, senior professionals make your story resonate and bring innovation to government contractors who, likewise, bring innovation to their customers.

301.588.2900

8606 Second Ave., Silver Spring, MD 20910

@BoscobelMktg

www.boscobel.com